Clinical Psychology

Children and Young Persons Diabetes Service

Clinical Psychology

The Clinical Psychologist helps children, young people and their families cope with some of the difficulties that can occur from having diabetes.

Why is there a Clinical Psychologist on the team?

Living with a chronic illness can make people feel sad, worried or angry. Living with diabetes means that young people have to think and do many things that their peers don't have to worry about. All these things can make looking after diabetes more difficult.

Talking to a psychologist can help you understand what is going on and find new ways of coping.

Some of the problems the Clinical Psychologist can help with are:

- Feeling sad and low in mood
- Lacking energy to look after diabetes
- Worries about treatment
- Managing your diabetes in school
- Letting your friends know
- Difficulties with food, eating and body image

What does the Clinical Psychologist do?

There are weekly outpatient clinics at The Stephanie Marks Centre for children, young people and their families. Sometimes children and young people are seen when they are admitted to the ward.

We will use talking and drawing to help understand how you and your family feel. The Clinical Psychologist will listen to your concerns and work with you to find a helpful way forward.

The Clinical Psychologist works with the other members of your team, including the doctors, nurses and dieticians, so everybody understands any difficulties you are having.

The Clinical Psychologist is different from a psychiatrist or doctor, as we cannot prescribe medication.

What will happen in the first appointment?

The first appointment lasts for an hour. The Clinical Psychologist will ask lots of questions about you, your family and your diabetes to understand what things are difficult for you as well as what is going well.

Everything we talk about is confidential, unless there are concerns about anybody's safety. We may sometimes decide it would be helpful to share some information with your family, school or medical team but we decide this together.

Before your first appointment

Before you come to your first appointment it can be helpful to make a list of the things that you want to talk about. This might be:

- What things you would like to change or be different
- What things you are finding difficult about looking after diabetes at the moment
- How you have been feeling recently
- What is going well

What happens next?

At the end of the first appointment we will make plans for what might help. This might be:

- Making suggestions for what might help and deciding that you don't need to see me again. Families often find a single appointment helpful.
- Arranging some further appointments to work with you on the problem, with you trying out things in between each appointment.
- Suggesting you see someone else to help with the problem.
